Nature Lover: Connecticut Windows on the Natural World

Getting close to nature

Connecticut Windows on the Natural World

The closest many of us get to experiencing nature is watching "Animal Planet" on cable TV. Here's something better: the wonderful blog written by Brendan Hanrahan, publisher of the "Road to Discovery" guides to Connecticut's natural wonders. Hanrahan finds much to admire in virtually every corner of our state. In a recent post, he waxes rhapsodic about the lowly fungus. "Fungi such as mushrooms belong to a kingdom of life all their own," he writes, "one defined by their unique forms, growth patterns, reproduction, and the functions they perform in forest ecosystems." Other posts deal with Connecticut geology, paleontology, and fisheries in a highly readable and informative manner. And if reading this blog gets you hooked on nature, check out "The Shared Landscape." a new guide to the parks and forests of Connecticut, published by the Friends of Connecticut State Parks.

The goal of Connecticut Weblogs is to help draw attention to state blogs and bloggers. How this works: Each half hour

Connecticut weblogs searches for updates to blogs in our registry. It looks for updated RSS feeds -- the same feeds that alert search engines to content changes on your blog. About Me

Ctweblogs provides these blog updates as a public service. It is not responsible for the content of the blogs in this listing or is it affiliated with its authors.
